Dear Congressman Rangel,

On behalf of millions of Colombians of African descent, we wish to congratulate you on your new position as Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Our community is truly heartened by the change in the leadership of the U.S. Congress, as Democrats will surely place a renewed emphasis on human rights in the trade and foreign policies of the U.S. government.

We thank you for your recent letter to the Bush administration and various public statements expressing discontent with the U.S.-Colombia and U.S.-Peru “free trade” agreements (FTAs) as they are currently written.

We are writing to you today to ensure that you have received the attached document – signed by 49 Afro-Colombian and Afro-Peruvian organizations – in opposition to these two trade agreements, and to respectfully urge you to closely review the concerns raised by our communities.

In Colombia, the problems associated with trade go far beyond labor rights. As the Washington Post recently reported, members of Colombian President Álvaro Uribe’s own political party have been arrested for coordinating massacres of rural communities with illegal armed paramilitary groups. These massacres are directly related to trade. In many cases, these deeds have served to accelerate the concentration of ownership of the best lands in the hands of paramilitary leaders or their front groups and to significantly weaken land rights, facilitate natural resource exploitation, weaken our communities’ environmental rights and facilitate the advance of development projects into our territories.

In the Colombian context, politically powerful export industries such as “African” palm oil, timber, mining and oil interests are directly benefiting from, and undoubtedly funding and coordinating, the systematic use of violent force to displace Afro-Colombian communities from their traditional territories in order to expand their exports to the U.S. Side agreements on labor will not protect us from these abuses.

If the U.S.-Colombia trade agreement were to be ratified without a complete overhaul, including the renegotiation of the agriculture and investment sections, the situation will deteriorate even more rapidly. The investment provisions would embolden export-oriented natural resource extraction corporations, while the agricultural rules would undermine rural economies. This lethal combination would result in the displacement of millions of poor rural Colombians from their lands, worsening their economic and social conditions and leaving them with no option other than to work for those groups that have violently displaced them from their lands and appropriated their natural resources, or to become involved in the informal or even illegal economic sectors. We must break this cycle.

We urge you to expand your critique of the U.S-Colombia and U.S.-Peru FTAs to address these issues, and call for a major renegotiation of these trade agreements, so that we can work together for peace and prosperity and set a new standard for fair trade in the hemisphere.

Sincerely,

Dear Member of Congress:

Attached please find a letter from Afro-Peruvian and Afro-Colombian organizations in Peru and Colombia regarding free trade agreements with the United States. Writing on behalf of 15 million Afro-descendant people, the groups are expressing their concerns about the negative impact the free trade agreements, as currently negotiated, will have on their communities.

Their grave concerns about the trade agreements are the following:

1. The trade agreements lack specific labor rules to protect the Afro-descendants and indigenous peoples from discriminatory practices endemic in Peru and Colombia.
2. The trade agreements will pit the largely 8 million small, Afro-descendant and indigenous farmers against heavily subsidized U.S. agricultural producers, causing even greater impoverishment of the populations and risking their extinction.
3. The trade agreements' investment rules threaten Afro-descendant and indigenous communities with displacement due to their proximity to natural resources risking again their extinction and extensive environmental damage.
4. The trade agreements' intellectual property laws will strengthen the patent rights of multinational corporations leading to an increase in the cost of health care, already prohibitive to poor Afro-descendants, and threatening ownership of traditional medicines.

Until there are real and explicitly stated protections for the Afro-descendant communities, the signers urge you to vote against the current and any similar trade agreements in the region. We ask that you take their concerns into consideration when you cast your vote. If we can facilitate with providing you with any further information on this matter, please let us know.

Sincerely,

Re: Afro-Descendants in Peru and Colombia Oppose the Free Trade Agreements with the United States

Dear Member of Congress,

On behalf of the more than 15 million Afro-descendant people from Peru and Colombia represented by our organizations, we are writing to you to express our deep concern with the Free Trade Agreements that have been negotiated between the United States and the governments of our countries.

We are certain that these Free Trade Agreements, if implemented, will lead to the further impoverishment of our people, decreased access to health care in our communities, and continued destruction of our traditional territories.

While requesting that you as members of Congress hear our concerns, we also call upon all African-American citizens of the United States, because they face similar dangers as ours with respect to increasing poverty and insecurity as a result of the economic policies advanced by the Free Trade Agreements. This is a call to our African-American brothers and sisters to join in our common fight against this threat which affects our people.

These are our main concerns regarding the Free Trade Agreements:

Labor: Weak labor rules do not include protection against discrimination

Racial discrimination is endemic in our countries, and strengthening the international framework of human rights laws prohibiting racial discrimination and xenophobia is a major priority of our organizations. While our countries have passed laws prohibiting racial discrimination, according to your own Department of State these laws have “not deterred discriminatory practices.”

During the negotiations process, the governments of Peru and Colombia proposed that the elimination of employment and workplace discrimination be included on the list of “internationally recognized labor rights” as part of the labor provisions in the agreement. Unbelievably, this proposal was rejected by the government of the United States.

This callous approach to discrimination issues reflects the broader problem with the Free Trade Agreements, which is that they include new rights and protections for multinational corporations but totally ignore the clear negative impacts on the people of the countries involved, and particularly on Afro-descendants and Indigenous populations.

Agriculture: Unjust competition will increase poverty

The people in our communities are mostly subsistence Afro-descendant and indigenous farmers. They depend on access to land in order to produce the food necessary for their own survival, as well as to sell to local markets in order to procure the currency necessary to buy food, medicine, clothing, and school supplies for their children.

In this context, rather than undermining our local markets, we need increased access to credit and technical assistance for small farmers, we need to improve the systems for transportation and distribution, we need to improve land use and ownership policies, and we need fairer prices for the commodities we produce. But the Free Trade Agreements with the United States do not offer a single one of these development alternatives for our people. On the contrary, they will increase unfair competition for our local markets. Our families will have to compete with heavily subsidized agricultural products from the United States, pushing us toward economic and cultural extinction.

The results of NAFTA in Mexico have caused over 1 million small farmers, most of them indigenous peoples, to lose their jobs and livelihoods due to such unfair competition. This has caused many to migrate illegally to the United States in search of employment. This confirms the danger that these Free Trade Agreements pose for our people.

According to the National Convention of Peruvian Agriculture (CONVEAGRO), nearly 8 million small farmers, the majority indigenous and Afro-descendants, will be excluded from their traditional markets, and will experience devastating economic consequences if the U.S.-Peru Free Trade Agreement is passed by the U.S. Congress as currently negotiated. Results in Colombia would be similar.

Displacement and extractive industries: Investment rules in the FTAs would impede protection of Afro-descendant populations

Similar to the situation of Native American peoples in the United States, our communities suffer the consequences of being located on top of or close to natural resources, such as oil and gas, coal, and other minerals. Mining projects such as the massive Cerrejon Norte coal mine in Colombia, owned by a consortium including an Exxon-Mobil subsidiary, have resulted in the forced internal displacement of entire communities of Afro-descendant peoples. Many of these projects are polluting rivers, lakes, and rainforests of the Amazon.

We know that mining corporations have used NAFTA to fight regulations meant to protect Afro-descendant and indigenous communities. Recently, Glamis Gold, a Canadian mining company, used the investment rules in NAFTA to sue the United States government for $50 million over a new regulation in the state of California that would require mining companies to backfill any open pit mines within one mile of a Native American sacred site.

This example is precisely the reason why the US-Peru and U.S.-Colombia FTA investment rules are profoundly concerning, as they will deter efforts to protect our territories. Worse still, the investment rules of the U.S.-Peru and U.S.-Colombia FTAs have been expanded to explicitly cover natural resource contracts, with a particularly broad definition. If enacted, there is no doubt that these investment rules would have a negative and chilling effect on the development of new environmental laws and regulations that are needed to prevent the destruction of our territories and those of the Amazon rainforest on which the whole world depends.

Intellectual Property: The FTAs would reduce our access to health care and lead to unnecessary deaths from treatable illness in our communities

More than half of all Peruvians—and nearly 80 percent of indigenous peoples and those of African descent—live on less than $1.25 a day. Peru has the third highest child malnutrition rate and one of the highest rates of maternal mortality in Latin America. Sixty-two percent of children live in poverty and 25 percent of Peruvians lack access to health care.

Despite dire warnings from the Peruvian and Colombian Ministries of Health, the final intellectual property chapters of these Free Trade Agreements would strengthen the patent rights of multinational pharmaceutical corporations, leading to a further increase in the cost of health care, which most Afro-descendants already cannot afford. In Peru alone, the Ministry of Health has estimated that the increased cost of these medicines will leave an additional 700,000 to 900,000 people without access to basic medicines, for example for diabetes and HIV. Those most affected will be the Afro-descendant and indigenous communities.

There is no question that more Afro-descendants and indigenous Peruvians, as well as Colombians, will needlessly die from lack of access to necessary medicines if these trade agreements are passed.

The U.S.-Peru Free Trade Agreement and the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, and assuredly the unfinished negotiations to include Ecuador, are structured entirely for the benefits of large corporations and not for the people of our countries. In every way, these trade agreements will further impoverish and displace the Afro-descendant and Indigenous communities of the Andean region.

For all these reasons, we respectfully urge you to oppose the U.S.-Peru Free Trade Agreement, U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, and any similar agreement resulting from the current negotiations between the U.S. and Ecuador.
